

Mark Drolsbaugh graduated from Gallaudet University with a B.A. in Psychology (1992) and an M.A. in School Counseling and Guidance (1994). An avid writer, Mark was a columnist for three deaf newspapers (DeafNation, Silent News, and SIGNews) and currently writes a blog for HuffPost. He wrote his first book, Deaf Again, in 1997. He followed that up with Anything But Silent (2004), On the Fence (2007), and Madness in the Mainstream (2013). Along with his passionate style of writing, Mark has also delivered presentations that offer a rare, behind-the-scenes perspective of deaf education. For over 20 years, Mark has worked at the Pennsylvania School for the Deaf as a school counselor. In 2014 he collaborated with PSD's Student Development Team in an effort that led to their becoming the first deaf Recognized ASCA Model Program (RAMP) under the American School Counselor Association. Mark and his wife, Melanie, enjoy traveling and attending their three kids' baseball and softball tournaments.
